Corning, based in the USA, is another highly reputable fiber optic manufacturer known for its innovations in low-loss optical fibers and high-performance subsea cables. While Corning is more prominent in long-distance terrestrial and data center applications, it also provides submarine-grade optical fibers suitable for zero-buoyancy cable systems. Their focus on bend-insensitive fibers and advanced connectivity solutions ensures reliable performance in complex underwater networks.

Fujikura Ltd. Fujikura, headquartered in Japan, is a pioneer in optical fiber and submarine cable technology. The company produces a wide range of submarine and zero-buoyancy optical cables, serving global telecommunications and energy sectors.

Fujikura's experience in high-capacity, long-distance underwater deployments makes it a strong alternative for specialized projects requiring robust cable performance.

Key Considerations

When selecting a zero-buoyancy optical cable manufacturer, consider: Subsea experience: Prysmian and Fujikura have decades of experience in submarine cable projects. Global reach and support: Prysmian operates 108+ manufacturing facilities worldwide, ensuring consistent quality and rapid deployment. Technological innovation: Corning's low-loss and bend-insensitive fibers improve signal integrity over long distances.

Compliance and certifications: Look for BEAD, Buy America, and other regional compliance if required for government or large-scale projects.

Conclusion

For zero-buoyancy optical cables, Prysmian Group is generally considered the most reputable due to its extensive submarine cable expertise, global manufacturing capabilities, and proven reliability in long-haul underwater deployments. Corning and Fujikura are also strong contenders, particularly for projects requiring advanced fiber performance or specialized regional support.
